Devilish Dilemma

The devil offers the deal. You write the catch. Split the room down the middle to win.

PARTY | 3–10 PLAYERS | ~15 MIN

THE STORY

Mr. Pitchfork is a 1930s cartoon devil in a tailcoat, and he has a deal for everyone. You can fly, but ____. You get a four-day work week, but ____. Each player gets a different deal on their phone and writes the catch. Then the room votes on every contract, Deal or No deal, without knowing who wrote it.

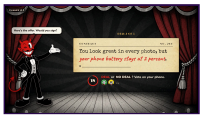

The scoring turns the usual party game around. A catch that everyone loves scores almost nothing, and so does one that everyone refuses. The author scores most when the vote splits the room down the middle, with a bonus for an exact tie. Voters score too, for siding with the majority, so everyone has a reason to read the room. After three rounds of contracts (the last one counts double) comes the Final Contract: one would-you-rather for the whole group, where you pick a side and bet on what most people chose.

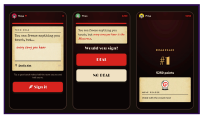

It runs on one shared screen, a TV or a screen share on a call, with every player on their own phone. Three to ten people can play, and a match takes about fifteen minutes from the first deal to the winner signing on the dotted line. The host or the first player to join can tear up any contract that goes too far, and a family-friendly setting keeps the stock deals clean. Groups can also bring their own deals and dilemmas.

| | |
|---|---|
| PLAYERS | 3–10 players |
| DURATION | ~15 min |
| TYPE | Party |
| PLATFORM | Browser, no installs |
| PRICING | Free to play |

HOW IT PLAYS

1. Put the stage on a big screen
   Open the game on the screen everyone can see and start a room.
2. Write the catch
   Every player gets a different deal with a blank at the end.
3. Deal or No deal
   The contracts come up one by one on the big screen, author hidden.
4. Split the room
   The verdict drops the votes into two piles and names the author.
5. Sign the Final Contract
   One last would-you-rather for the whole group.