THE STORY

It is 11 PM on December 23rd, and Santa's workshop has gone dark. Tinsel McGillicuddy installed the SleighOS update a day early and tripped the Holiday Shutdown Protocol, which locked every department, killed the lights, and put the toy line to sleep. Santa gets exactly one full night of rest a year, and tonight is the night. He cannot wake up. You and your team are the seasonal Night Shift, and you have until the midnight inspection to bring the workshop back online and get the sleigh ready to fly.

North Pole Night Shift is a cooperative escape room you play in a browser over a video call. Your team explores five candlelit rooms in full 360, from the workshop floor and the mail room to Mrs. Claus's kitchen, the reindeer stables, and the sleigh bay, waking each dark department as you go. Nothing here can be solved alone. What one person needs is usually written down somewhere another person is standing, and a few moments ask for more than one pair of hands at the same time. Most of the shift happens in conversation: describing what you see and getting everyone onto the same page.

The mood stays cozy and gently funny, full of elf bureaucracy, sticky-note memos from Management, and a cocoa machine named Gerald who has opinions. Nobody is evil and nothing jumps out at you. The worst a machine will do is sneeze glitter. It suits corporate teams and family gatherings, and welcomes players who have never touched a video game. It works as well across time zones as it does around one table. Built for teams of two to eight, and a shift runs about ninety minutes.
